

Congress Must Reauthorize the Disadvantaged Business Enterprise (DBE) Program

This good-faith program helps ensure that the benefits of federal infrastructure investment stay rooted in local communities.

★ DBEs Are Critical to Maine's Economy

Across the country, more than 50,000 DBE-certified small businesses employ over 500,000 people, many of whom live in the communities where these businesses operate. In Maine alone:

- 198 DBE-certified businesses currently operate and compete for contracts.
- These firms create an estimated 1,980 good-paying jobs in their communities.

DBEs are often trusted, local specialty contractors, providing stable jobs for working families and reinvesting in the places they call home. In rural areas, DBEs are frequently among the largest local employers.

★ The DBE Program Works—For Maine and the Nation

The DBE program levels the playing field in a historically exclusionary industry.

It ensures that:

- Qualified minority- and women-owned businesses have access to contract opportunities.
- Taxpayer dollars stay local—supporting small, independent businesses instead of being siphoned off by larger, out-of-state firms.
- Local contractors who live with the infrastructure they build have a vested interest in getting the job done right.

These businesses undergo rigorous certification to qualify as DBEs, and they are ready to deliver.

★ The Stakes Are High: What Happens Without Reauthorization

Without reauthorization, the DBE program—and the local jobs and businesses it supports—will be at serious risk.

- Many small businesses could lose access to critical infrastructure contracts.
- Communities across Maine could face layoffs, reduced wages, and business closures.
- America's infrastructure sector would suffer from reduced competition and innovation, with large firms dominating contract awards.

★ Congress Must Act

Failure to act would have devastating consequences for Maine's small businesses and local economies.

Congress must reauthorize the DBE program to ensure:

- Fair competition in the transportation construction industry.
- The continued vitality of America's subcontracting economy.
- That infrastructure investments truly reach the communities they're intended to serve.
